

Should nepotism be really criticized?

I know nepotism exists at all places, but does criticising it really help? Not only in the film industry, but also in our everyday life. The dictionary has a very narrow meaning for nepotism, but nepotism is a much broader term itself. It could also mean choosing or preferring someone you know over any stranger. All of us have been doing that and we don't realise it, yet we choose to be quiet about it. We can rant about nepotism all day but our hypocritical minds don't realise the irony of our lives. If given a choice, would a person prefer a blood relative and a close friend, or a stranger? Always the people you know. Blood is truly thicker than water. This same applies to the film industries and the high paid jobs. Nobody can deny opportunities and nobody should be blamed for getting those opportunities. Nepotism cannot be removed or even reduced from the society and there should be no reason for removing it. People shouldn't be blamed for nepotism. The less privileged should work hard to match those people instead of making nepotism a big issue.

Thank you.
